Theology and Tobacco.

In the reports of proceedings at several recent conferences of the Methodist Church we find the announcement that candidates for the ministry were each asked if they would abstain from the use of tobacco in any form and that their answer was received with loud applause, even to the extent, we suppose, of shaking the spitoons conveniently placed throughout the building for the use of the older brethren. Now, it is well known that philosophers, among whom we will gladly count theologians, have been addicted to the use of tobacco. Sir Walter Raleigh, who introduced the weed into England, found his chief solace in a pipe, as did Sir Isaac Newton, of whom it is related that when one day smoking in the presence of a lady to whom he was as affectionately attached as a philosopher could be he took her hand, and instead, as she expected, of making a declaration of love, used one of her delicate fingers as a pipe-stopper. Now, with the example of two such eminent men before us, is it to be supposed that weak human nature will not imitate them? And if we come down to modern times, we find some of our most noted literati and divines styling tobacco an aid to reflection. Its use has spread to all classes of society, and in speaking of its effects a well-known writer says that "it produces a state of languor or repose most agreeable to those accustomed to its use." What more necessary, therefore, than that our clerical friends should have something with which to soothe them after their vigorous and persistent attacks on immorality and infidelity? The Turk who smokes incessantly is impervious to trouble, a phlegmatic Dutchman finds a pipe a preventive of vexation or irritation, and the council of the silent Indian are always conducted in a dignified manner, owing doubtless to the presence of the pipe which accompanies them. With all due reverence be it said that theological as well as political discussions are not always free from acrimony, and instead of forbidding the use of tobacco it might be productive of good to introduce it into public deliberations, so that in the charm of its presence and by the fragrance of its odor old wounds might be healed and peace and harmony reign supreme. In private as well as in public life its soothing influence is often felt; and it is not unlikely that even Jupiter himself, when Juno was cross and petulant, retired to a neighboring bank of clouds, and let his domestic troubles pass away with the smoke that curled up in ethereal fashion from his pipe.

It is of course admitted that at different times objections, having the weight of kingly and priestly authority, have been made against the habit. King James the Sixth, who was a staunch churchman and a descendant of that other king who the old historian styled "a sore saint to the crown," wrote a famous "Counterblast against Tobacco," but this is more than counterbalanced by the fact that if Christopher Columbus had not discovered America the plant in question would have been unknown; and as that gentleman has been enrolled in the calendar of saints, it would be presumptuous to conclude that he was instrumental in discovering anything of a pernicious character. It pains us to observe that these worthy preachers, while compelling candidates for the ministry to abstain from the weed, leave it optional to acting ministers as to what course to pursue. Seriously, however, we cannot agree with these worthy men in this crusade against tobacco. "Jenny," said an old Scottish elder to a young woman who was arraigned before the "kirk" for having danced at a ball, "what were you thinking of, when you were dancing?" "Nothing wrong," was the trembling culprit's reply. "Then Jenny," was the sage advice, "always dance." And if a man thinks that he has a call to preach the gospel, and yet can consistently smoke his pipe, let him enjoy his belief. His influence for good will not be weakened thereby, nor his flow of spiritual thought obstructed. There are graver social and ecclesiastical questions than this clamoring for a hearing, and there is a danger that while titling "mint and rue and all manner of herbs" men may "pass over judgment and the love of God."

"Dr. Benson's Celery and Chamomile Pills for the cure of Neuralgia are a success."—Dr. G. P. Holman, Christianburg, Va. 50c. at druggists.

The law does not take kindly to figurative speech. A barrister before Lord Ellenborough once began, "My lord, I appear before you in the character of an advocate for the city of London; the city of London herself appears before you as a suppliant for justice. My lord, it is written in the book of Nature—"What book?" asked Lord Ellenborough, taking up a pen. "The book of Nature," "Name the page," said his lordship, dipping his pen in the ink to note it down.
